Editorial Review

From School Library Journal

Grade 5-7—Like many teens, Emily has tons of friends, thinks her parents are totally uncool, and wishes for a boyfriend. For her birthday, Aunt Chester sends her a set of blank cards called Flashcards of My Life. Each card has a label like Friends, Kiss, Identity—different topics to spark some writing. Emily starts on the cards and, in the process, readers learn about her. Her best 24-hour friend, Sandra, doesn't like her school friends, Sarah W. and Sarah J., leaving Emily stuck in the middle. The girls all have crushes on different boys and there's the constant swirl of rumors of who likes whom. The story is full of early teen angst—being uncomfortable in one's body, not sure why parents act like they do, crying over the smallest things. The style and language are aimed at younger readers; however, some of the topics make the story a better fit for older readers. For example, the girls think their gym teacher is a lesbian because of her roommate's picture on her desk. The font appears to be handwritten, and numerous doodles, charts, and diagrams adorn the pages. An entertaining but hardly earth-shattering look at junior high life.—Diana Pierce, Running Brushy Middle School, Cedar Park, TX

Gr. 5-8. During the course of five weeks, Emily fills out a set of journaling cards entitled, "Flashcards of My Life." Each card has a journal-entry prompt, such as "Friends," "Kiss," or "Things That I Hate." Using the cards, Emily chronicles the familiar ups and downs of junior high, which may seem small to adults but are monumental to some kids: juggling friends who don't like each other; wondering if Andrew, her crush, will return her affection; and dealing with her nosy, embarrassing parents. Emily turns to her flashcards in moments of crisis (when her friend Sandra reveals she's been hiding a secret boyfriend) and times of joy (when Andrew kisses her). Readers will be attracted to Emily's appealing "handwritten" pages, decorated with heart and flower doodles, as well as to her young, innocent voice and chatty, confidential tone. A good little sister to high-school favorites such as Meg Cabot's Princess Diaries books. Jennifer Hubert
